CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

Each year, an estimated 1.2 to 1.5 million children and youths disappear from home, with the numbers and problems continually increasing. In 1976, the runaway youth centers funded by the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act served 15,000 youngsters. In 1981, services were provided to 133,000 drop-in clients and 45,000 sheltered children.

A federal study of runaway youths reported that children left home because of: (1) poor communication with parents; (2) existence or fear of child abuse, neglect or sexual exploitation; (3) unreasonable demands or restrictions by parents; (4) disruption within the family system; and (5) school related problems.

Other studies indicate that runaways gone from home for over a month usually become prostitutes, averaging at least three years in prostitution. Runaway and other missing children as young as eight have been picked up, beaten, addicted to drugs, and used in child prostitution and pornography. Local and national "buy a kid" rings exist, from which children may be purchased nightly or permanently. Most of these children suffer from mental and physical diseases; many don't live long. The majority of runaways are never reported as missing by their families. Runaways gone over six months rarely return.

Who are the runaways?

Children of the rich, the poor, and the middle class run away. They leave black, white, Hispanic, blue-collar, and white-collar families. Contrary to popular myth, girls on the run do not outnumber boys. Most runaways are 15 to 17 years old.

How far and how long do they run?

Most are gone only a few days, and all but a small fraction of the runaways return within six months. Half of them have traveled fewer than 10 miles from home.

What happens on the road?

Some runaways report enjoying their experience because of the freedom from school, meeting new people, and seeing new places. Many report a neutral experience — neither positive nor negative. Others suffer from hunger, cold, or fear. Some are victimized by streetwise youths and adults. Unfortunately, some are beaten, robbed, raped, or jailed while on the road.

How do they return home?

The largest group of runaways returns on their own, but others are located by parents, police, relatives, and friends.

CHAPTER 2

TYPOLOGY AND SERVICES FOR RUNAWAYS*

Because the runaway problem is extremely complex, it is perhaps the most difficult issue to resolve in the arena of detention reform. There are two clear sides to the issue. One strongly feels that runaways are to be incarcerated for a period of time to gather information, secure assistance from other agencies, and make arrangements for returning youths home. This side feels that detention protects young people from the evils of the street while preventing them from running.

The other side of the argument is equally forceful in expressing their viewpoint. The runaway has not committed a crime and should not be treated as a criminal. Detaining runaways only postpones the time when they will run. As many bad things could happen to a child who is in jail or detention as could happen on the streets. Jail does not protect. Runaway behavior is a social problem that requires a social solution.

Both arguments appear valid. What is generally absent in debating/discussing the issues over the years, however, is reliable information regarding runaway behavior. Without understanding the dynamics and nature of children who run, it is difficult to determine how they should be treated. It is this lack of information that enhances the myths and misconceptions about the runaway child.

Through the years, valuable information on the dynamics of runaway behavior has been secured. The application of this knowledge, however, appears limited to runaway and crisis programs, and is not transferred to the rest of the juvenile justice system. Based on research, and practical operational experience, the following is a typology of runaways, and a discussion of suggested services.

There are basically four types of runaways. Their behaviors are different and the services they need vary.

*This chapter is based upon excerpts from a speech presented by Jim Oleson, Director of the Alpine Mental Health Center, Breckenridge, Colorado, to the Western Colorado Jail Removal Conference in Grand Junction, Colorado, on December 16, 1983.

I. HEALTHLY RUNNERS

These children run from a very negative home situation; histories of abuse, incest, and indifference are prominent. The purpose in running is to secure help. At the same time, as a result of years of victimization, they are frightened, distrustful of adults and social agencies. Destructive emotions, such as rage and depression are common.

- They will usually run alone, with more than two together being rare. They will initially seek out crisis homes and shelters. They want to resolve their pain.
- Traditional residential services will be effective if the program can tolerate some acting out, a lot of testing and confused behavior.
- Generally, they will seek help as close to home as possible. They may go to relatives or friends first.
- Use of drugs and alcohol may be common. Delinquent behavior is usually minor and for attention getting purposes.
- You can usually focus immediately on solving the primary problem which causes the running away.
- It is important that they be treated effectively, in a nonpunitive way during their first episode, or they will seek more destructive solutions.
- This group constitutes 50 percent to 60 percent of all known runaways.

II. UNHEALTHY RUNNERS

These youths run for the wrong reasons. They may have the same problems as the healthy runner, but their responses and attitudes are different.

- This is the drug, sex, rock and roll group.
- They focus on pleasure to escape pain.
- They are unpredictable and have a tendency to run in groups. Three or more are common.
- The group is fragile and transitory, but very important. It represents protection and survival.

- Their runaway patterns are unpredictable. They may go long distances or stay close to home. This is usually determined by the personality of the group, and the degree of hassle they receive from home, school, law enforcement, etc. (The street is their refuge; their friends have become their families.)

This group is very self-destructive, especially in their use of drugs and alcohol. They have a high potential for delinquent behavior, which is done for protest, and/or survival reasons. Members of this group can be very volatile and severely disturbed.

- Most of them started as healthy runners but were not helped in the system.

Treatment of these individuals is very difficult. Two or more in a shelter can be disastrous. Success in treatment may depend on their most recent runaway experiences. If they were victims of abuse, assault, or abandonment by group members (much like their history at home), or difficult drug experiences, they may again look to traditional programs and services. Food, shelter and protection is important, but usually only for short periods of time. Their pathology will then again control their behavior. They will return to the group to escape the pain of their problems.

It is important to get the unhealthy runners' attention. Programs should try to refocus their allegiance to the in-house group. Keep them busy with activities, errands, and work. Attachments to the staff and residents are critical. One should not focus on the youth's primary problems until some bonding has occurred. After this attachment has developed, one should start to work on solving problems. Some running away can be expected as progress is made. It is usually short-term, however, and contact with the program will continue.

These youths don't give you much time, from a few hours to a day or two, so the staff must work fast. The primary focus is to get their attention and keep them in the program.

These youths constitute 15 percent to 20 percent of all known runaways.

III. CURIOUS RUNNERS

This is the exploratory youth (usually male). He doesn't feel he has any problems.

- He runs to something rather than from something.
- He feels little or no pain. He has a sense of independence and autonomy, and usually runs by himself.

- He may explore drugs and alcohol, as he does geography, and it is part of his inquisitive nature.
- Delinquent behavior is usually nonexistent or very minor.
- He is usually very cooperative and agreeable to treatment services.
- Imposing some responsibilities, initiating parental contact, encouragement, and assistance will facilitate his return home.
- His runaway behavior is inconsistent. He may do this frequently or only once. Many youths travel long distances and are gone for a long time. Others stay close to home and may go for one or two days.
- This group constitutes five percent to ten percent of all known runaways.

IV. CHRONIC RUNNER

This youth is pushed out, abused, abandoned. A failure in all systems. They are working out their own solutions to their lives.

- They are vagabonds before their time.
- They have learned to accommodate their pain.
- Most of their behavior is predictive, and extreme emotional reactions are no longer observable.
- They have usually made decisions regarding drugs, crime and sexual preference, and they can go in any direction.
- They are very street wise and have many stories to tell about their experiences.
- They are usually loners, or very discriminating in whom they run with. They are not self-destructive; in fact, they are survival-oriented.

They will use shelters or crisis homes for their primary purpose: food, shelter, warmth, cleanliness, companionship. They are knowledgeable about the system and know that it hasn't worked for them.

Services should focus on enhancing their survival skills, and if given the opportunity, on adopting a less dangerous life style.

- This group constitutes 10 percent to 15 percent of all runaways.

These are types of youths you see in our facilities. It is important to note that these categories are not mutually exclusive. You will see different traits and behaviors in each type. However, looking at the primary characteristics will provide focus and direction in how to deal with each runaway.

Many programs that service these youths are well-meaning, but make major mistakes in their treatment. They treat all runaways the same, and don't differentiate among the reasons for their running. These errors will compromise their credibility with the youths, and jeopardize their effectiveness. Too many programs see only one solution--return home. This should simply be one of several options.

Some programs try to do too much, too soon. They try to solve all the problems all the time. Problem-solving should be geared to the runner's receptivity and abilities.

In some situations, the program's attitude is wrong. Practitioners seem to pass judgement on the child's behavior, rather than seeing it as a symptom of a youth's problems. Some judgements include:

- Running is bad. (In many cases it is the best or only thing a youth could do.)
- You will get into trouble or be hurt. (These youths have been running. They know if they have been hurt or in trouble.)
- If you don't stop running, you will be locked up for your own protection. (Most youths feel being locked up is punishment, and not protection. In many cases, the youth has had more problems while being confined than on the streets. They simply know better.)

There are some general approaches or techniques that programs can implement which will be helpful in working with runaways.

These include:

(1) Develop a runaway profile.

Understand the runner's dynamics and characteristics. Do a history. Most runners will repeat past behaviors. They develop routines and rituals around running. Knowing this will help you understand and treat the youth's behavior.

(2) Develop a formal contract upon their admittance, and modify as appropriate during their stay.

Contracts may include things such as an agreement about no drugs, sex or violence; or what they will do for themselves, and what the program will do for them.

Formalizing an agreement gives the youth structure and clear expectations. Make responsibilities specific rather than vague. This helps him understand his role.

- (3) Observe and react to runaway signals. All runners exhibit them but they are not the same for all youths. A few are described below.

Different behaviors or change in daily patterns.

Quiet phone calls.

Questions to residents or staff regarding geography, resources, activities, whereabouts of former residents, etc.

Inappropriate anger at staff or peers. (This is done to justify the running.)

Withdrawal, isolation.

Regression in the program. (The youth is starting to get close to people, and he doesn't trust his feelings, or is afraid of getting hurt again.)

A natural response after observing some of these signals is to introduce a runaway watch. The purpose is to tell the youth that we know you are preparing to run, and that we will do what we can to stop you.

Runaway watch includes:

- Close and more intensive supervision, especially during the times or circumstances when he has run in the past. More activities, errands, work assignments, social and group events.

In some cases, peer monitoring is helpful, using other residents to observe behavior and encourage him to stay.

- Swarming, a process where all available staff and residents intervene with an individual during a critical period, to deal with problems and reduce his desire to run.

Many years ago we put lepers in colonies because we didn't understand their disease.

Today we put runaways in jail because we don't understand their behavior. Perhaps someday we will.

CHAPTER 3

RESOURCES FOR RUNAWAY YOUTHS

When a child runs away from home a number of steps can be taken by parents or others.*

- (1) Contact relatives, the child's friends, and parents of friends, since runaways sometimes run to or with someone they know.
- (2) Notify the police. If possible, provide a recent photograph of the runaway.
- (3) Leave a message for the runaway at the closest runaway shelter, and call the toll-free hotline numbers listed below for information.
- (4) If the runaway calls home directly, youth workers suggest that parents express positive feelings for the child.
- (5) If the child returns and the problems which led to running away persist, professional counseling should be considered.

Nationally, a number of organizations provide referrals and services for runaways. These include the National Runaway Switchboard, a 24-hour toll-free hotline, operated by Health and Human Services' Youth Development Bureau, which permits runaways to telephone home long distance, free of charge, relays and receives messages for youths and families, and staffed by volunteers, provides counseling and referrals to appropriate agencies nearby; the privately funded Runaway Hotline, based in Houston, Texas, and staffed by volunteers which relays messages confidentially from youngsters to parents, and provides referral services to shelters 24 hours daily; and the National Network of Runaway and Youth Services, the national clearinghouse for runaway issues and referral.

RESOURCES FOR MISSING CHILDREN

For many reasons, including increased public awareness and outrage, the problem of missing children has become a focus of national concern. It is estimated conservatively that each year, in addition to runaways, 6,000 to 8,000 children are abducted by strangers, and 150,000 by parents in custody disputes. Sexual molestation and use in pornographic photography are often the fate of "stranger abducted" children. They are seldom recovered alive.

The Behavioral Science Unit of the FBI suggests the following generic categories of abductors:

1. Psychotics--frequently, women who have lost or are unable to have children;
2. Profiteers--mainly criminal exploiters who market children to adoption rings or pornographers;
3. Pedophiles--possibly the largest grouping, who abduct children for sexual purposes, perhaps terminating in the child's murder;
4. Serial or "recreational" killers--who abduct and almost invariably murder their victims.

If a child disappears from a family unit, early ascertainment and investigation will increase the chances for success in locating him or her. Too often, no report is made in the early stages when the chances of finding a clue are the highest. The following are actions* which may be taken:

1. File a missing persons report IMMEDIATELY with local police or sheriff. Be truthful. This may mean making a critical self analysis of family conflicts and/or relationships. Too often the authorities are handicapped in giving assistance because they are not aware of all the circumstances leading up to the disappearance.
2. Ask authorities to register data with the National Computer Information Center (NCIC Missing Persons Report and Request for NCIC entry). If they refuse, go to the nearest FBI office, provide information including name and badge number of original police contact. The FBI will provide a packet of detailed information for police and subsequent NCIC entry.

3. Ask authorities to check whether the missing person is being detained for a crime anywhere.
4. Ask authorities to register your missing person with their State Department of Justice (or computer data bank).
5. Stay in touch with the authorities. But do not take up their time needlessly. Be sure, however, that you are receiving all necessary cooperation.
6. Offer a reward in your newspaper, and distribute posters with photo/description/date of disappearance/contact telephone (usually police or sheriff) and/or address (post office box whenever possible). Always offer the reward for verified information.
7. Check Social Security records to determine if file is active. Provide as much personal data on the missing person as possible to: Social Security Administration, Public Inquiries, Department of Health and Human Services, 6501 Security Boulevard, Baltimore, MD 20235.
8. Check with the FBI.
9. Check with your State Bureau of Investigation. This may have to be done by your police/sheriff.
10. Check with State Department, Washington, DC, for possible passport data.
11. File a missing persons report with the Salvation Army. They will aid in locating missing persons, and maintain a card file on people who come in for free meals. Contact other missions as well. Many maintain records on those receiving free food.
12. Start a scrapbook. It is a good source to inform yourself constantly as to what others have done.
13. Keep a pencil and paper by the telephone to record information, if any comes. If possible, have a tape recorder handy to record messages.
14. GET AS MUCH PUBLICITY AS YOU CAN. If the missing person is alive, some such publicity may reach him or her.
15. Check area morgues and hospitals for unidentified persons and/or bodies.

16. Check which religious cults have been active in your area. Show missing child's photo around in young people's "hangouts." Show concern rather than anger.
17. List in pictorial publications, such as CHILD FIND MAGAZINE, and POLICE TIMES (American Federation of Police). (See agency listing for addresses.)
18. Send details to the national or state agency which meets your needs. (See listings.)
19. Check out all ideas or suspicions. DO NOT RULE OUT ANYTHING EVEN IF IT APPEARS "OUT OF CHARACTER"; the mere fact the person is missing (if no foul play) is usually "out of character."
20. Check with each state's motor vehicle registration department (if a car is involved). If your city or county is a member of the computer service this can be done almost instantaneously. If not, and you have a legal reason, write to the Motor Vehicle Registration Department of each state for a "Request for Driver Record Information."
21. If you child has been abducted by a natural parent, check with your local District Attorney's Office for advice.
22. If you child is of age to join the armed services, check with each branch.
23. Check with Post Office, subscription lists, employers, or any other place an address change may be requested.
24. Check past telephone bills for out-of-town numbers which may be a source of possible destinations, and credit card bills for out-of-town purchases.
25. If a private detective is employed, be careful to obtain a reputable one.
26. Be cautious in dealing with "psychics." Do not pay large sums of money. Pay after results are obtained, not for unproven "visions."
27. Send details with photo to Missing Persons Bureau, Bergen County NJ, 1 Court Street, Hackensack, NJ 07601.

Experts emphasize that children should be warned about the hazards posed by strangers, and about adults who offer them bribes, or inveigle them into "secrets." While police in some communities have undertaken public education on child safety and fingerprint children for identification, there is general agreement that educating children to protect themselves "must begin at home and never end."

In a recent article,* the following suggestions were offered to parents to help increase a child's awareness of potential danger:

- Make sure your child knows his full name, address (including state) and telephone number (including area code) and how to reach the operator or make a long-distance call.
- Teach your child that a stranger is someone that he or you don't know or don't know very well. "Bad" strangers are people who want kids to go somewhere with them or want to give them a present, like candy or a puppy, or want to take their picture. Tell your child that if he meets any bad strangers he should tell you about them. Many experts offer even stronger advice: they say children should avoid strangers entirely.
- Tell your child that it is unusual for adults to ask children for help or for directions and that it is best to ignore them. If a stranger calls your child to a car, he shouldn't go near it. If he is followed by an automobile or on foot, he should run home, to the nearest public place or yell, "Help!" Children should not run and hide in a deserted place.
- Keep a copy of your child's fingerprints and be able to locate dental records. Take photographs every year (four times annually for children under two).
- Don't buy items with your child's name on them, such as T shirts or lunch boxes. Children will respond more readily to a stranger if they are addressed by name.
- Instruct your child never to answer the door when home alone or tell anyone over the phone that he is home alone.
- Outline what your child should do if he becomes separated from you. If separated while shopping, the child should not look for you but go immediately to the nearest checkout counter and ask a clerk for assistance. Tell him never to go to the parking lot.
- Never leave a child unattended in a car. Advise him to walk and play with other children if you are not around.
- Be sure your child's school or day-care center will not release him to anyone but you or someone designated by you. Set a code word with your child to be used as a signal if you send an unfamiliar adult to pick him up.

*Nikki Finke Grunberg and Holly Morris, "The Simple Rules of Safety," Newsweek, 19 March 1984, p. 80.

- Tell your child that no one has the right to touch him or make him feel uncomfortable or ask him to keep a secret from you.

Frequently, missing children are transported across state boundaries, which greatly compounds the problem of locating them. Most organizations that deal with the issue of missing children, therefore, provide local and national assistance and perspectives.
