ACQUISITIONS

The Commission gratefully acknowledges that these workshop materials were prepared without cost to the Commission by the staff of the Female Offender Resource Center: Catherine Milton, Director; Catherine Pierce, Assistant Director; and Betsy Hippensteel, Administrative Assistant. The Female Offender Resource Center, 1800 M Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. 20036, 202-331-2200, has been funded by the U. S. Department of Labor, Employment and Training Administration.

Because the authors have in mind using the workshop guideline for other future purposes, the suggested goals are geared more toward immediate action rather than recommendations. They also assume more prior planning than the timing of State IWY Meetings may permit.

For example, item #4 on page 2 urges mobilization of a special task force before the close of the workshop. Recommending the establishment of task forces unquestionably falls within the proper role of an IWY State Meeting, but on-the-scene formation of such a task force may not be a feasible expectation.

WORKSHOP GUIDELINE ON

* FEMALE OFFENDERS *

This guide is to assist you in conducting a workshop on juvenile and adult female offenders. It contains four sections. The first suggests goals and a format for the workshop. The second is a fact sheet* which can be duplicated and distributed to workshop participants. The third section includes National contacts, pertinent films and publications. The fourth, an insert, is a regional listing of possible speakers, panelists, and resource persons.

PART ONE: GOALS AND SUGGESTED FORMAT

The first step in deciding what kind of format would work best for your group is for the planners to spend some time assessing the local situation regarding women on probation, women confined in jail or prison, and young women in the juvenile justice system.

Do State sentencing and/or probation laws result in longer sentences for women for the same offense? Are female juveniles kept in detention longer than young men? Are they being incarcerated for minor offenses? Is vocational training available for girls and women? Are halfway houses, work release, and training release programs available to women? Are girl and women prisoners protected from sexual abuse? Are their health needs being met?

* The State Coordinating Committee may put its heading at the top of page one of the fact sheet, or the heading of the National Commission may be used. Additional State-related material may be added to the fact sheet prior to its distribution.

With this background information the planners can then meet to decide on goals.

FOUR POSSIBLE GOALS:

1. Action. The workshop should begin with a statement of its purpose: action. Explain that facts, information, and case studies will be presented as a way to encourage the formation of action-oriented coalitions which would work to improve conditions for female offenders, both adult and juvenile.

2. Present facts. Localized information on female offenders should include facts on the characteristics of these offenders; the kinds of crimes they are being arrested and confined for, and the trends relating to these crimes; the specific problems which apply exclusively to women or more frequently to women than to men, including examples of discriminatory practices.

3. Give project ideas. Descriptions should be given of model project activities which have been implemented in different communities to improve the treatment of female offenders. Examples should include projects developed during each of the different stages of the criminal justice process such as arrest, pre-trial intervention, jail, probation, community based programs, prison, parole and unconditional release. Detailed information on a few good projects should also be provided.

4. Develop recommendations and a plan for action. Participants should be encouraged to develop a specific work plan and recommendations which focus on remedying the problems female offenders face in your State. We would expect that by the end of the workshop a task force with responsibility for consulting with key policy makers as well as seeking additional resources (either organizational commitment or funding) might be appointed and mobilized.

5. Consider for workshop approval or amendment the IWY Commission's 1976 recommendations on juvenile offenders, p. 158, juvenile justice and delinquency prevention, p. 157, and women offenders, p. 292.

WORKSHOP FORMAT IDEAS

The format of the workshop will obviously vary according to the amount of time available and according to the special problems of the female offender in your locality. Specific recommendations for speakers and contacts are included in the Resource Section and in the accompanying regional insert. Possibilities would include all or some combination of the following:

1. Keynote speaker. A dynamic speaker who is knowledgeable about both the problems of female offenders as well as project possibilities can present the facts and encourage the group to act. Ideally the speaker should be a woman who has experienced jail or prison or someone who worked directly with female offenders. Seek out the superintendent of a women's jail or the project director of a community-based program.
2. Panel presentation. A panel whose members have different perspectives is one of the best ways to present information about the needs of female offenders. Combinations could include (1) either a woman on probation, confined in jail or prison, or a participant in a community program serving female offenders; (2) a project director of a female offender service program; (3) a representative from a Commission on the Status of Women or an organization which has been active in improving the lot of the woman offender, such as the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, N.O.W. or W.E.A.L.; (4) an individual familiar with the problems and programs with a national perspective; (5) a representative from a Federal funding agency (i.e., Law Enforcement Assistance Administration or the Dept. of Labor); (6) a director of a nearby women's prison, jail or half-way house; and (7) an employment and training specialist.

The first panel possibility is a female offender who is either presently in a correctional facility or on recent release. She could tell about problems female offenders face and could help the workshop participants understand the needs of the offender.

Another panelist possibility would be a project director of a female offender service program. This administrator could describe the problems female offenders have re-establishing themselves in the community: a lack of skills, low education, family responsibilities, a criminal record, and other liabilities. This person could also discuss project problems such as adequate funding; lack of community acceptance; lack of coordination among criminal justice, employment and training programs.

The third possibility for the panel is a representative from a Commission on the Status of Women or an equally active community women's organization with experience in developing relevant programs for adult and juvenile female offenders. An individual familiar with the problems of developing such programs could offer specific suggestions on funding, mobilizing support and hiring staff.

Another panelist could offer project possibilities. He or she might work for a national association concerned with the problem of female offenders. Or she might have directed a national research project on offenders.

A fourth panelist might be a representative from a Federal agency, (for example a regional representative from the Department of Labor's Women's Bureau or a representative from the local Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) planning unit.) This individual could describe the kind of local programs and services for female offenders, and the funding resources available for female offender projects. Hopefully, this individual would be knowledgeable about the Comprehensive Employment Training Act (CETA), LEAA and relevant Health, Education and Welfare Administration (HEW) programs--such as Title XX.

You might also ask the director of a near-by women's prison, jail or half-way house to describe the female offender and her problems as well as the kind of programs that exist to help her. This individual, based on her experience, could summarize the greatest areas of need.

Finally, an employment and training specialist can address the special program needs of women. One of the female offender's biggest problems is finding and keeping a job that pays her well. This individual could be a representative from the local CETA prime sponsor or a representative from the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organization's (AFL-CIO) Human Resource Development Institute. He or she would address the problems that women offenders in particular face when attempting to find a job, particularly a "non-traditional" job, such as welding, driving a truck, repair work or construction. Problems which should also be addressed here would include acceptance by employers and fellow workers, and support from family and friends. This specialist should be familiar with CETA programs and should be able to describe ways of mobilizing unions and employers to work on behalf of female offenders.

A good panel presentation should allow each member to speak for about 10 minutes while leaving at least 30 minutes for questions. If there is time, another possibility is to follow the question period with a small discussion group in which panel members would act as resource persons. Additional suggestions for small group activities follow.

3. Film. There are a few good films which depict the problems of female offenders, adult and juvenile. The resource section of this guide includes a list and a short description of several possible films. The advantage of a film is that the issues and problems can be dramatically portrayed. The disadvantage is that specific local problems and issues are not addressed nor is a specific work plan for action encouraged. Therefore, a film is recommended only in conjunction with other approaches.

4. Small discussion groups. One of the better ways to begin developing a plan of action is to assign tasks to small discussion groups. But two essentials are necessary. The first is a good group facilitator who is trained to draw out people's ideas, keeping the discussion on target, and who has a solid understanding of the goals of the workshop. The second is good resource people who understand the problems and are placed in each group to answer questions, give short presentations, and help with the specific work plan.

5. Careful selection of participants. Probably the most important task of the workshop planners is to make sure that the right participants are invited to attend. Five groups should be considered. A check list summary is included at the end. The first are representatives from the criminal justice system, including at least one person from the police department, the local jail, the juvenile detention center, the state women's prison, court, the probation department, the bail agency, the parole board and at least one community based program.

A second important group to invite are the employment and training specialists. They are essential if recommendations are to be made in the employment area, yet many of them do not know about the specific problems of female offenders. You should locate the best possible invitees by writing the mayor, governor, and/or county administrator, asking him/her to suggest the representative from the CETA program--either from the planning council, the administrator, or staff. A list of suggested specialists is also included in the Resource Section.

The third group would include women who have been confined or are on probation. Rather than relying on one female offender to make a speech, you might invite several to attend and take part in planning the action programs. These women can suggest from their own experience the kinds of changes that are most important. Also, because of their experience, they will most likely be very committed to working on a specific plan for action. To identify possible invitees you can contact the administrator of any of the correctional facilities or local advocacy groups.

Fourth, you should include representatives from women's, youth and community service organizations. Some of these groups (included in the resource section) may have already sponsored relevant programs and could therefore share their experiences. You might also want to include people from the public defender's office of the court system or a representative from a lawyer's group such as the local bar association: some of the problems tackled at the workshop will reflect the need for additional legal services, such as possible class action law suits charging sex discrimination against female offenders.

The following is a check-list of invitees who might be useful:

- I. Criminal Justice Representatives
 1. Police
 2. Courts
 - Adult
 - Juvenile
 3. Jail
 4. Juvenile Detention Center
 5. Probation
 - Adult
 - Juvenile
 6. Bail Agency
 7. Department of Corrections
 8. Parole Board
 9. Community-based Program
 10. Local Criminal Justice Planners,
City or County
 11. Other?
- II. Employment and Training Specialists
 1. CETA Administrator or Staff
 2. CETA Advisory Board Member
 3. Union Representative
 4. Project Director
 5. Women's Bureau Regional Administrator
 6. Other?
- III. Female Offenders
 1. In Jail
 2. In Prison
 3. In a Half-Way House
 4. On Probation
 5. Other?
- IV. Organizations
 1. Women's
 2. Youth
 3. Offender Advocacy
 4. Lawyer's Group
 5. Social Service Agencies including mental health, drug abuse, education
 6. Other?

6. Follow-up tour of local jail or prison, for those who are interested in pursuing further. One dramatic and effective way of informing a group about the problem of women offenders is for them to tour a local women's prison or jail. Usually the administrators of these facilities will permit a tour if adequate notice is given. In some cases the administration will be on hand to answer questions. Before deciding which facility to visit, the planners should be aware of the differences between prisons and jails. A prison houses felons sentenced for a year or more while a jail is a short term holding facility where most of the women are awaiting trial or serving time for misdemeanors. Women's prisons are usually located in rural areas; jails are usually in cities. Prisons usually have some vocational training programs; jails often provide nothing for the women to do except sleep and eat.

Juvenile facilities are also divided into two general categories. The juvenile "detention center" is where youth are detained prior to trial or placement in a program and a "training school" is an institution where youth are committed for extended periods of time.

If it is not possible to arrange a tour of a jail or prison, then the next option is a visit to a community based program such as a halfway house. This visit should be more informal and is probably only feasible for a group of about ten.

RECOMMENDATIONS (from "...To Form a More Perfect Union..."
Justice for American Women) The IWY Commission asks for workshop reaction to the following:

1. Recommendation on Status Offenders (page 158)

The IWY Commission recommends that State legislatures undertake as a high priority the establishment of more youth bureaus, crisis centers, and diversion agencies to receive female juveniles with family and school problems, misdemeanants, and when appropriate, first felony offenders, with the ultimate goal of eliminating as many status offenders as possible from jurisdiction of the juvenile courts.

The Commission further urges that the juvenile justice system eliminate disparities in the treatment of girls by courts and correctional agencies."

[Original version of the preceding recommendation approved by the Child Development Committee on Jan. 10, 1976, but revised by the Commission: (page 160)

The Child Development Committee recommends that State Legislatures eliminate status offenses,, used to discriminate against young women, from the jurisdiction of juvenile courts, and that States establish more youth bureaus, crisis centers, and diversion agencies to receive female juveniles with family and school problems, misdemeanants and, when appropriate, first felony offenders.]

2. Recommendation on Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (page 156)

The IWY Commission recommends that the Federal Government support full funding toward carrying out objectives of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

3. Women Offenders (page 292)

The IWY Commission recommends that each State Bar Association review State laws relating to sentencing, and their application, to determine if these practices discriminate against women, and that each State review and, where needed, reform its practices relating to women in jails, prisons, and in community rehabilitation programs, with a special emphasis on:

Improved educational and vocational training opportunities in a nonstereotyped range of skills that pay enough to support a family;

Making available legal counseling and referral services;

Increased diversion of women offenders, both before and after sentencing, to community-based residential and nonresidential programs such as halfway houses, work release, training release, and education release; attention to the needs of children with mothers in prison;

Improved health services emphasizing dignity in treatment for women in institutions;

Protection of women prisoners from sexual abuse by both male and female inmates and by correctional officers;

Utilization of State funds to recruit better qualified corrections personnel with the parallel goal of increasing the number of women at all staff levels in correctional institutions.

The IWY Commission further recommends that State Commissions on the Status of Women be supported by State governments in establishing task forces to focus on the needs of women offenders.* These task forces should make regular inspections of all women's detention facilities. Members should include lawyers and judges. Furthermore, the task forces should provide legal counseling and referral services. The press and public should be kept informed of task force observations.

* An excellent model for such an effort is run by the Pennsylvania Commission on the Status of Women. Task forces in Boston; Kansas City; Dade County, Florida; and the State of Maryland are also quite active.

FACT SHEET

* FEMALE OFFENDERS *

Until 1975, the absence of specific profile data on women in prison was a distinct handicap for any group that tried to develop a program assisting women offenders.

A national survey by the Women's Prison Association in 1972 had shown most of a sample of 135 correctional institutions and halfway houses were not keeping socio-economic information on women in prison.

Three years later, a much-needed National Study of Women's Correctional Programs was funded by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, U.S. Department of Justice. This 1975 study surveyed 16 State prisons, 46 county jails and 36 community-based programs to develop the following information about incarcerated women:

Age: Two-thirds of incarcerated women are under 30 years old. The median age of unsentenced women and misdemeanants is 24 years and the median age of felons is 27 years.

Ethnic: 50% of the women are black. Native Americans are also over-represented.

Education: The majority are less educated than women as a group. 45% had not finished high school and 14% had completed elementary school only.

Marital Status: At the time of their incarceration, 27% of the women were single; only 10% of the inmates had been living with spouses prior to incarceration.

Children: 73% of the women have children. 56% had dependant children living at home prior to incarceration. The average number of children was 2.78. Husbands were involved in only 10% of all child care arrangements.

Welfare: 56% of the women had received welfare as adults and 33% had received welfare during their childhood.

Childhood: Half of the women came from two-parent homes; 31% lived with the mother only; 3% without a mother; 4% with no relatives.

Work: Almost all of the women had worked at some time in their lives; 40% worked in the two months prior to incarceration. Most expressed the desire to work.

Vocational Training: Those women who had received vocational training were usually trained in clerical skills, cosmetology, nursing or paramedical fields.

WHAT ARE THEIR CRIMES?

Despite increases in the arrest rates of women, women still commit fewer crimes than men and fewer women are represented at all stages of the criminal justice process. In 1975 one of every five persons arrested was female. According to the 1970 Bureau of Census report, one of every ten persons in jail -- either awaiting trial or serving sentences of a year or less -- was female. And the 1974 FBI Uniform Crime Report said that one of every thirty persons finally sentenced to jail or prison was a woman. The Uniform Parole Reports indicate that in 1973 one of every sixteen persons on parole after release from a State prison was female. And according to the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare study of the juvenile justice system, young women represented 26 percent of the cases heard in court in 1973.

There are several theories why females make up a relatively small proportion of the offender population. One is that they do indeed commit fewer crimes. Another is that the male-dominated criminal justice system tends to protect women -- police may be more reluctant to arrest a female, the prosecutor may be less inclined to charge her, and a judge or jury less inclined to convict her. There is a corollary theory that the types of crimes women tend to commit are considered less threatening to the community. Even the typical female homicide, for example, is described as a crime of passion; women rarely kill strangers. Finally, there is the claim that because women are denied equal job opportunities and economic status they have fewer opportunities than men to commit crimes. These and other factors quite possibly contribute to the differences in the male and female offender population.

Most female offenders have been arrested for property crimes--specifically larceny. In 1975 larceny accounted for 24% of all female arrests; the next largest percentage of female arrests was disorderly conduct (9%), and running away (9%). Arrests for prostitution represent only 3% of female arrests and homicide accounts for less than one percent.

There has been a dramatic increase in the number of women arrested for property crimes. From 1960 to 1972, FBI statistics show that the rate of female arrests increased three times faster than the rate for males and the most dramatic increases involved larceny, embezzlement, forgery, and fraud. In 1953, one out of every seven arrests for larceny involved a female; in 1972 the rate was one out of every three.

Yet, the proportion of females arrested for violent crimes--homicide, assault, robbery--has remained constant for the past twenty years. About one out of every ten violent crimes is committed by a female.

WHAT IS NEEDED?

Studies show that female offenders want help finding jobs more than they want any other form of assistance after release. A 1976 survey by the Female Offender Resource Center of community-based programs representing 6,200 female offenders found that a lack of job skills is the greatest problem encountered by female offenders (84%). A lack of education was the second most important problem and difficulty in arranging for child care, readjusting to family life and coping with prejudice were all listed as the third most significant problem.

WHAT JOBS DO WOMEN OFFENDERS WANT AFTER RELEASE?

Discussion groups were sponsored by the Urban Coalition and the South Forty Corporation at New York's Bedford Hills Correctional Facility in April, 1974. Although the vocational training at Bedford Hills focuses on sewing prison clothes for the state correctional system, not one of the 20 women participating in the discussions wanted to be seamstresses after release. The jobs they were interested in ranged from secretary to professional guidance counselor, to electrician and telephone repair person.

Twenty-five percent of the 101 women who completed questionnaires in a 1973 Oklahoma study wanted business-related training as secretaries, switchboard operators, bookkeepers, and the like. An additional 25 percent were interested in learning medical skills. Fifteen of the women wanted training in cosmetology and modeling, and eight wanted to learn technical trades such as welding, barbering and meat cutting.

WHAT ARE THE DIFFERENCES IN TREATMENT?

A number of national surveys and studies have revealed particular differences in the treatment of male and female offenders. Some of these differences seem to benefit women; others suggest patterns of neglect. Ten significant differences are:

Prison and jail facilities. Because there are fewer women incarcerated than men, many communities and at least four states and the District of Columbia, which have institutional facilities for men, do not have them for women. In these communities there are two options: (1) the women are sent to the nearest female institution, or, (2) the women are held in a segregated section of a male facility. The first option has the disadvantage of isolating women offenders from their families and communities, which may be several hundred miles from the institution to which they are sent. In the alternative, women offenders confined in male institutions are isolated from the general prison population and usually not permitted to join in special education and job programs. The result is an unwarranted type of solitary confinement. Additionally, the smaller number of women has also meant that the prison facilities which do exist are less specialized: female first-time offenders, juveniles and hard core repeaters are often housed together, a practice which is employed less frequently with the male offender population.

Vocational training in prison. A 1973 national survey of prisons by the Yale Law Review found that men's prisons had an average of 10 vocational training programs per institution compared with an average of 2.7 programs in women's prisons. The study also showed that the types of programs offered differed considerably. The men's prisons offered programs in financially rewarding fields like electronics, printing, plumbing, data processing, radio/t.v. repair, welding, and tailoring. In contrast, women's prisons offered housekeeping, cosmetology, food services, nurses aid and secretarial training.

Children of offenders. Although between 70 and 80 percent of the incarcerated females have children and approximately half of these mothers are the sole supporters of their children, there are few programs sensitive to the needs of offenders who are mothers.

In a 1974 survey of 81 Federal and State prisons by the Junior League of New York, 39 institutions indicated they did not have any programs for inmates' children. Some of those responding affirmatively offered basic referral services. Three actually had nurseries.

Incarcerated mothers frequently face special problems: loss of contact with their children immediately after arrest, with no way to locate the children for long periods of time; loss of custody for mothers who are sole supporters, and possible placement of children in foster homes or referral to adoption agencies. The Junior League survey found that of the 727 children under five years of age, 70 percent were being cared for by relatives; 14 percent were in foster homes; and 16 percent in institutions or released for adoption.

Women offenders under supervision in the community may face similar problems. For example, probation and parole conditions often require that the offender locate and maintain employment. However, most of the special job training and education programs do not provide child care facilities. Regular child care programs may exclude mothers who are offenders.

Work-release programs. A Southern California Law Review Survey in 1974 found that women in California prisons are often not permitted to participate in work release programs. Prison officials gave these reasons to defend the exclusion of women:

There are fewer women offenders than men, so it is not economical to spend limited program funds on women;

Women are unsuited for work release because they do not have to support themselves or dependents; and,

It is more expensive to provide separate housing facilities for women.

Juveniles. A majority of juvenile girls in custodial institutions are charged with "status offenses" such as truancy, running away and incorrigibility-- offenses for which adults could not be confined. However, most boys in institutions are not there for status offenses but because they have been legally declared delinquent; i.e. the offense they committed would have been criminal if committed by an adult. According to a 1974 study by the National Assessment of Juvenile Corrections Project, nearly 75 percent of the girls detained in juvenile correctional facilities are status offenders, as compared with only 25 percent for boys. This same study also found that girls, detained for less serious offenses, are confined for longer periods of time. Another recent study in New York State revealed that the average reformatory stay for girls was 12 months, compared to 9.3 months for boys.

Health care. According to the Yale Law Review Survey, women's prisons are less likely than men's to have a full time medical staff or adequate hospital facilities. In 1974 the Citizens' Advisory Committee in Texas also found that incarcerated women did not have easy access to the recommended preventive health measures. The committee reported that no regular pap tests were given and no gynecologist was available on the staff of the Texas Department of Corrections to serve the 650 female inmates.

Pregnant women in prison encounter special problems. Most institutions have no health care facilities for either the mothers or newborn children. The Health Law Project of the University of Pennsylvania Law School reported in 1972 that mothers whose babies are born in custody are pressured to give up their infants for adoption. A similar study done in Connecticut revealed that prisoners were told parole would be denied unless the children were put up for adoption. Furthermore, in some institutions pregnant prisoners are often denied the right to have an abortion.

Treatment by the courts. Using data from a 1962 publication of the American Bar Foundation, researchers Stuart Nagel and Lenore Weitzman revealed in a 1972 study that there are considerable differences in the way women and men are treated during court handling of their cases.

Among the inequities cited: A woman is less likely than a man to have an attorney, preliminary hearing, or jury trial. And certain State statutes dictate that women but not men be given indeterminate sentences. This practice means a woman's sentence in those jurisdictions is potentially longer than a man's for the same violation.

Pretrial intervention programs. Prior to the trial, some defendants--often young, non-violent first-offenders--are given the option to participate in supervised programs to earn dismissal of pending charges. Approximately 135 communities have established such pretrial intervention programs to provide an alternative to incarceration. However, because females were few in number, most of these programs initially excluded them. Officials cited administrative difficulty in providing services to both sexes. In the past few years PTI programs have changed their eligibility criteria to include females, although most programs still do exclude those charged with prostitution and in some cases, shoplifting. Since many women fit into these categories, they are, in fact, still being denied pretrial intervention services. In addition, several surveys and reports suggest that many pretrial programs serve women only secondarily, do not acknowledge that women have special problems and program needs, and have predominantly male program staffs which do not work effectively with female defendants.

Special prison services. The 1973 Yale Law Review survey found that general support services in prisons--health, counseling, library, religious, and recreational--are less available to women than men. In all-female institutions such services are more likely to be totally lacking. And in those institutions where women and men are housed in separate sections, the women are often excluded from participation in available programs.

Different prison structures. Generally, an advantage of women's prison facilities is that they are smaller and appear more like dormitories than the traditional high-security facilities built for men. For example, in many women's prisons the inmates have private rooms, are not required to wear uniforms, and have fewer restrictions.

WHAT IS BEING DONE?

Major efforts to assist the plight of women offenders are being made by various government agencies, organizations and citizen task forces. The Female Offender Resource Center, established as a coordinating clearinghouse in 1975 by the American Bar Association [1800 M Street NW, 2nd floor, Washington, D.C. 20036, (202) 331-2200] has been funded by the U.S. Department of Labor to identify promising local, State and Federal programs for female offenders; to collect research, to develop new action projects, and to examine legal issues and policies, among other functions.

Several States have organized coalitions or special projects which address the local needs of women law offenders. The Pennsylvania Program for Women and Girl Offenders, founded in 1968, in cooperation with the American Association of University Women was the first of such State-wide organizations. PPWGO has worked with State and county officials to improve prison conditions and court practices related to women, and has organized community-based programs to provide women with housing, legal counsel, child care, employment, job training, education and individual counseling. PPWGO has also conducted community seminars to inform citizen groups about local justice systems, and has supplied information to news media, legislators, and the courts. [For further information, contact Margery Velimesis, Executive Director, Pennsylvania Program for Women and Girl Offenders, 1530 Chestnut Street,

Philadelphia, Pa., 19102 (215) 563-9386.]

Two of the more promising local service programs are Step-Up in Norfolk, Virginia [Suite 203 JANAF Executive Center, Janaf Shopping Center, Norfolk, Va. 23502, (804) 461-4557] and Wider Opportunities for Women, an employment program for women probationers in Washington, D.C. [1629 K Street, N.W.; Washington, D.C. 20036, (202) 638-4868]

The Step-Up program emphasizes non-traditional job training and placement for women immediately upon their release from county and city jails. Women can choose from job options that include auto mechanics, broadcasting, upholstery, accounting and landscaping. Step-Up is also developing training workshops to provide courses in carpentry, plumbing, tool technology, wall-papering, plastering, electronics, horticulture, painting, and building maintenance.

The project is CETA-funded by the State of Virginia's Governor's Employment and Training Services Council. [For further information contact Sandra Brandt, Director, Step-Up, 2201 Wilson Blvd., Suite 402, Arlington, Va. 22201 (703) 527-5602.]

Wider Opportunities for Women also emphasizes placing women probationers in non-traditional jobs. The District of Columbia Social Services Division refers women to W.O.W. for training and placement in a variety of work including construction, meat cutting, basic electronics, and automotive and major appliance repair.

Counselors help arrange for daily child care, health care, housing, and other personal needs. Adult Basic Education courses are taught daily, and participants are encouraged to obtain a General Equivalency Degree.

Each participant receives a small expense stipend while training. W.O.W. expects to work with 60 women per year at an estimated annual cost of $2,700 per participant. (In comparison, it costs $23,000 a year to confine a woman in the D.C. Women's Detention Center.)

Funding sources for the program include the Ford Foundation, the Meyer Foundation, the New World Foundation, the Public Welfare Foundation, the Shaw Foundation, the Strong Foundation, and the District of Columbia Office of Criminal Justice Plans and Analysis.

[For further information contact Andrea Cleaves, Director, Wider Opportunities for Women, 1649 K Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. (202) 638-4868.]

The Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor initiated in International Women's Year (1975) what has become an ongoing program of consultations and special community meetings to determine how citizen groups and government can better meet the local employment needs of women offenders. The first four consultations have been held in Baltimore, Miami, Kansas City and Boston, with at least two meetings planned for 1977 in southeastern States.

A 60-70 page report outlining recommendations for a step-by-step community plan of action will be available sometime in the spring, 1977, from the Women's Bureau, U.S. Department of Labor, Room 3313 South, 200 Constitution Avenue, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20210. The tentative title of the report is "Design for a Program on the Employment Needs of Women Offenders." For any questions on the program, contact Elsie Denison, Women's Bureau (202) 523-6643.
