WORKSHOP GUIDELINE ON

* WIFE ABUSE *

ACCEP...

The purpose of this guideline is to assist you in setting up a workshop on wife abuse. We have tried to provide as much factual information as possible upon which you may draw. Included is a fact sheet containing national data on the subject which is suitable for duplication and distribution to workshop participants. The fact sheet outlines what is presently known about the problem of wife abuse.*

Appended to the fact sheet are separate lists of resources organized under the headings Refuges, Speakers, Films, and Publications. These resources may complement or substitute for local experts and material on wife abuse.

When setting up a workshop, keep in mind the following:

GOALS:

- 1) to acquaint participants with the problems of abused women;
- 2) to review pertinent State law and current and past efforts to revise the law on abuse;
- 3) to present the facts about organizational activity in major population centers aimed at addressing the problem of wife abuse: e.g., the existence of coalitions, study groups, task forces, refuges, etc.;

*The State Coordinating Committee may put its heading at the top of page one of the fact sheet, or the heading of the National Commission may be used. Additional State-related material may be added to the fact sheet prior to its distribution.

- 4) to present information about how to set up a refuge;
- 5) to arrive at specific, action-oriented recommendations for easing the plight of abused women.

Goal #1 could be met in a variety of ways: presentations could be made by an abused woman who has obtained a divorce; or a member of a study group, a State lawyer specializing in domestic relations, a social worker who has dealt with family violence; a person who has worked in a refuge; a policeman who has answered calls from abused women; or a representative of the district attorney's office could be asked to speak.

In each case, the person making the presentation should be asked ahead of time to have available specific information. For example, a police officer might be asked for data on the number of calls received each year on domestic violence, the number of deaths resulting from domestic violence each year (by sex of victim); the number of arrests made for domestic assault, what written or oral instructions the police receive for handling cases of spouse abuse; what assistance is offered to the victim, etc.

A panel discussion could be organized. Or, a film could be shown. In addition to local resources, such as a lawyer or police officer from your State, an out of State speaker could be selected from the list provided here.

Without doubt, many of the workshop participants will be very knowledgeable about this topic and will contribute factual information about wife abuse. In many cases, panel members will serve as resources whose expertise will complement the discussion among workshop participants.

Goal #2 could be achieved by means of a presentation from an experienced and knowledgeable lawyer from your State who is active on behalf of abused women. Or, a member of an organization which is lobbying for change (such as a local chapter of the National Organization for Women) could be invited to speak. Or, a handout containing information on the State law could be given to workshop participants. Perhaps the State Commission on the Status of Women would prepare a brief review of pertinent State and case law.

Goal #3 could be fulfilled by soliciting information from the Status of Women Commission, the office of mayors and city managers, the police department of major metropolitan areas, the city or district attorney's office; the YWCA, local chapter of NOW, or the Legal Aid Society. If there is a major university with a law school, the Dean of the law school may know of student activities on behalf of abused women.

Goal #4 could best be met by a presentation from a person who participated actively in establishing a refuge. If no refuges exist in your State, you may contact someone from one of the refuges listed in the fact sheet and ask one of the founders to attend the workshop. In many cases, leaders in refuges might assist you in locating abused women who would be able to speak in the workshop.

Goals #1-4 could be met by a panel with knowledgeable people speaking on each topic.

Goal #5: Recommendations

Very likely, workshop participants will suggest recommendations on the basis of their own experience and the dynamic discussion among participants and resource people. The following recommendations are suggested for workshop consideration in addition to those which emerge from the workshop.

Recommendation I

The Women's Meeting recommends that the (Status of Women Commission), (the Governor's office), (the legislative counsel of the State legislature), or (any group with special interest in the subject), draft and support amendments in the law to provide maximum legal protection for abused spouses through removal of inter-spousal tort immunity to permit assaulted spouses to sue their assailant for civil damages; and granting an abused spouse the right to obtain an enforceable injunction and restraining order barring the abusive spouse from the family home or assaulting the victim.

COMMENTS:

The New York State law of 1937 may be a model for other States in removing spousal tort immunity. It states:¹

Right of action by or against married women, and by husband and wife against each other for torts.

A married woman has a right of action against her husband for his wrongful or tortious acts resulting to her in any personal injury..., or resulting in injury to her property, as if they were unmarried, and she is liable to her husband for her wrongful or tortious acts resulting in any such personal injury to her husband or his property, as if they were unmarried.

One common objection to the removal of inter-spousal tort immunity is that it might give rise to collusion between husband and wife in order to collect insurance payments. To prevent just such collusion, the New York State legislature enacted a law providing that no policy of insurance could cover liabilities of the insured because of death or injury to his spouse.²

Also, the objection that such a legal change would produce a flood of trivial suits has been dismissed by the judges in several States who have permitted suits between spouses.³

Finally, the argument that such suits would undermine marriage has been dismissed as ridiculous by several judges who argue that women should not be denied their right of redress.⁴

The State of Massachusetts permits a woman to obtain a vacate order in conjunction with an action for divorce or separate maintenance.⁵ If necessary, a victim can obtain the order within twenty-four hours. Violation of the court order is considered a trespass and is enforced by the police. The order is in effect for ninety days and it can be renewed. A similar procedure may be recommended for your State. The essential features of such an injunction are that it can be obtained, if necessary, very quickly and that it have strong enforcement provisions.

Recommendation II

The Women's Meeting recommends that women concerned about the treatment of abused wives organize task forces in local communities where such task forces do not exist. Task forces should include representatives from the police, social welfare agencies, and the prosecutor's office, if possible. Such task forces may: review the law, police practices, available alternatives for victims of abuse, and procedures in prosecutors' offices; recommend changes as needed, mobilize public support for change; and establish shelters for abused wives.

FACT SHEET

* WIFE ABUSE *

THE PROBLEM

Until recently, a man had a legal right to "correct his wife for her misbehavior."¹ It is clear that wife beating still occurs.

While there are no nationwide statistics on wife assault, we do have data from pilot projects. For example, in Kalamazoo county, Michigan, there were 5-600 cases of assault a year in a county with 40,000 families.²

In Montgomery county, Maryland, the police intervened in 285 cases of assault in 1974.³

Wife assault cases comprise 35% of all of the assault cases reported to the Washtenaw county, Michigan, police departments.⁴

In another study of forty families known to be violent, the researcher found that over one-third of the forty neighboring families also reported spousal assault.⁵

And, spouse assault is a common cause of divorce. A 1966 study of divorce applicants found that 36.8% listed abuse as a complaint.⁶ Another study of 150 divorce prone couples found that 17% said that violence occurred in their marriage.⁷

Public opinion condones a degree of spouse assault. The National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence found that 25% of the men and 16% of the women surveyed approved of slapping a spouse under some circumstances.⁸

The law also condones spouse abuse. The typical police practice in situations of domestic violence is to avoid arresting the assailant while emphasizing the physical safety of the police officers. This practice is usually justified by asserting that family disputes cause more police deaths than any other type of crime. However, this assertion is unproven. FBI statistics on police deaths are available only for the broad category of "disturbance" calls. Domestic violence is only one of many components of this category. Thus, there are no nation-wide data on the number of police killed while responding to domestic violence calls. Now, the police do not make the safety of the victims their primary concern. In addition, District Attorneys rarely prosecute those who assault their spouses.⁹ Many women don't prosecute for fear of reprisal.

The reluctance of law enforcement agencies to intervene on behalf of the victims of spouse assault has grave consequences. Such violence tends to be chronic, vicious, and often homicidal in intent. The Kansas City police department found that in 85% of the family homicides, the police had been called to intervene at least once; and in 50% of these cases, the police had been called upon at least five times. And, women were the most frequent victims of family assault and homicide.¹⁰

What alternatives are available to abused women? While the legal remedies available to victims of spouse abuse vary greatly from State to State, the following options are being explored by women concerned about this problem. First, since the police rarely arrest the assailant, a victim may tell the police that she wishes to make a citizen's arrest. However, most people are not aware that they may do so, and the police rarely inform victims of this right.

In some States, efforts to change the law are aimed at broadening police powers of arrest. Washington State law permits the police to arrest a person believed to have committed a misdemeanor. In Florida, a bill was introduced which would permit the police to arrest without a warrant a person who is reasonably believed to have assaulted a spouse (HR3474, 1976). However, it is not clear that the police would exercise their power of arrest, since most training manuals used by local police forces follow the advice of the International Association of Police Chiefs to avoid arrest, restore the peace, and leave.

Another option which has attracted much interest of late is for the victim to seek temporary refuge in a shelter for battered wives. Volunteer groups of women, acting either alone or in conjunction with government and private agencies, have created at least twenty-nine such shelters across the country and many more groups of women are attempting to create additional refuges. These shelters are valuable in that they provide the victim with physical security and supportive counseling services which encourage her to take positive steps to reorganize her life away from her assailant.

The drawback to the reliance upon a shelter is that it disrupts the life of the victim and her children, while leaving her assailant in full possession of the family home. In some cases, the woman might be charged with desertion and she may jeopardize her rights in a subsequent divorce settlement. Therefore, one alternative to leaving the family home would be obtaining an injunction or temporary restraining order which bars the assailant from the family home and from further assaults upon the wife. New York and Massachusetts permit the issuing of such orders, while Maryland and Pennsylvania have proposed similar laws.

A final option is for the victim to sue her assailant to recover damages. The threat to sue might act as a deterrent and an award of damages could provide a woman victim some financial security as she begins a new life without her spouse. At present, only New York has a law permitting a spouse to sue the other spouse for intentional damage to person or property. Four States, Illinois, Louisiana, Hawaii, and Pennsylvania have laws which prohibit such suits. Laws in Pennsylvania and Maryland have been proposed to correct this condition by removing "interspousal tort immunity".

Courts in eighteen additional States have reinterpreted common law to permit, in some circumstances, such suits by victims of abuse. However, the courts have not followed a uniform standard here. In Minnesota, the court required, "substantial evidence... (of) excessive or... gross abuse...."¹¹ The Virginia courts have only applied this right to sue to cases arising from automobile accidents.¹²

However, twenty-three States still follow the common law rule which denies an assault victim the right to sue a spouse. Thus many women are effectively denied recourse for justice unless the legal authorities are willing to file criminal charges against the abusive husband. This rarely happens.

Although counseling services should be available to the couple who jointly want to resolve the problem of abuse and preserve their marriage, abusive behavior is difficult to reform. Professionals working with abused spouses suggest that divorce is often the only real solution. However, for many women--especially those without job skills and experience -- divorce may mean a sharp drop in their standard of living. Very few women collect alimony and only about a quarter of the women having child custody regularly collect child support.¹³ Thus, if women are to have a real alternative to remaining with an abusive spouse, the laws affecting property settlements at divorce must be reformed.

WHAT OTHERS HAVE DONE

In many States, women have formed Task Forces or coalitions to deal with the problem of wife abuse. They first seek to document the existence and extent of wife abuse in their community by reviewing police files and asking law enforcement agents to keep separate statistics on the problem.

Second, they determine what the law permits in their State and find out how the police normally respond to abuse cases.

Thirdly, they create, where none are available, emergency shelters for women. The goal is usually to publicize the problem and the existence of the shelter, open a telephone hot line, and provide 24 hour service with back up counseling and legal service to the victim.

In some States, women have prevailed on legislators to introduce bills to change State law to permit interspousal suits and the issuance of injunctions barring the spouse from the home and from personal contact with the victim.

Many local television stations have produced film documentaries in which local activists and battered women have been interviewed. These shows have aroused public interest in the problem and have encouraged many abused women to seek help. One such program, produced in Baltimore, Maryland has been so successful that it has been shown free at two major city fairs which attract thousands of visitors.

Some women's groups, such as the Ann Arbor-Washtenaw county NOW chapter and the Women's Law Center in Baltimore, Maryland, have written booklets on women's legal rights concerning abuse and divorce, as well as manuals for counseling abused women.

Finally, women's coalitions have been formed at the neighborhood or city level to mobilize all of the concerned governmental, social, cultural, and religious organizations into a cooperative effort to publicize and respond to the problem of wife abuse.

As a final historical note, there is some evidence that women in the past adopted vigilante methods to combat wife abuse. A recently published history of women in New Jersey during the American revolution notes that groups of women went, "...in the Evening to the houses of such as are reported to beat their Wives; where one of them entering in first seizes the Delinquent, while the rest follow, strip him, turn up his Posteriors, and flog him with Rods most severely, crying out all the Time, Wo to the Men that beat their Wives." ¹⁴
