PREFACE

Through the joint concentrated efforts of numerous law enforcement and criminal justice personnel and agencies, the Louisiana Commission on Law Enforcement has developed and adopted statewide criminal justice standards and goals. With the utilization of federal discretionary grant funding, the Commission set out with the ideals of reducing Louisiana's crime and improving the components of the criminal justice system. Employing numerous resources concerning criminal justice standards and goals, those standards and goals most applicable to the Louisiana Criminal Justice System were selected, studied, and in some cases, adopted.

This volume of the Louisiana Criminal Justice Standards and Goals Publication provides a description of the formulation process of standards and goals. In addition, the utilization of standards and goals in planning for the expenditure of criminal justice funds is discussed. For reference purposes, a short title listing of standards, an enumeration of the goals, and a chart interrelating standards and goals are included.

THE FORMULATION OF LOUISIANA'S STANDARDS AND GOALS

Louisiana, like most of its sister states, is experiencing a rapid increase in its crime rate. No one needs to prove this to our citizens — they can see it for themselves, in the deserted streets of our cities at night, in the fear that it is causing people to purchase security equipment and firearms, and on radio and television shows.

The crime statistics themselves are staggering. In 1974, according to the Louisiana Criminal Justice Information System, almost 185,000 index crimes (property and violent crimes) were reported in Louisiana. This means that, in 1974, approximately one out of twenty Louisianians was the victim of a crime. These crimes occurred at a rate of one every 2.9 minutes. Of the reported index crimes, over 25,000 were violent in nature. Those fear-inducing crimes affected approximately one out of every 150 persons and occurred at a rate of one every 21 minutes. There is also reason to believe that these figures do not present the entire crime problem since many offenses, both property and violent crimes, go unreported. For example, some studies have indicated that as many as nine out of ten rapes are never reported. The most frightening aspect of crime statistics, however, is the rate of increase. The first quarter statistics for 1975 indicate that crime in Louisiana has increased almost 10% over the same period in 1974.

Combatting this increase in the crime rate are over 900 state and local agencies in Louisiana that comprise what is loosely termed the "Criminal Justice System." The term is inappropriate for two reasons: the juvenile justice process is not, strictly speaking, part of the criminal justice system; secondly, the system is fragmented by functional and geographical variation.

Functionally, the system is divided into basically three components: police; courts; and corrections. Each component has an assigned task that is narrowly defined by law. The job of law enforcement is to enforce the laws and arrest lawbreakers; that of the courts is to determine guilt or innocence; that of corrections is to rehabilitate offenders and to keep them separated from society.

Very often, the relationships between components of the system are characterized by cooperation and coordination. Occasionally, the temptation to shift the blame becomes too great and the public is at a loss to fix responsibility. Law enforcement blames the district attorneys for not prosecuting all alleged offenders. The district attorneys blame law enforcement for mishandling the evidence. Both blame the judges for being too lenient and the defense lawyers for freeing persons on what law enforcement and prosecutors call "technicalities," but defense attorneys call "rights enumerated under the Constitution of the United States." Finally, everyone blames the correctional authorities for "putting the criminals back on the street before the victim gets home from the hospital."

The system is also divided geographically into cities, parishes, and judicial districts, with an often confusing overlapping of responsibility. A serious crime committed on the Louisiana State University Campus in Baton Rouge, for example, could be investigated by the University's Campus Police, the Baton Rouge City Police, the East Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff's Department, and, in some instances, the State Police. On the other hand, if the docket of the Orleans Criminal District Court is overcrowded, the situation cannot be alleviated by help obtained from the 24th Judicial District Court in Jefferson Parish. In fact, progress in balancing parish jail populations through the concept of multi-parish prisons has only occurred within recent years.

The fact that the system is fragmented has several advantages. The system is designed with the limitation of power in mind, since the concept of a unified, but overly powerful and overly bureaucratic justice system is contrary to principles embodied in both our state and national constitutions. In addition, the concept of local police power, with the authority to enforce ordinances that the people in a particular jurisdiction think best for their city or for their parish, is deeply engrained. But when the fragmentation is such that services to the public are affected and the crime rates double and even triple in a ten year period, then something must be done to make the "system" function more effectively.

In 1967, Congress recognized the need for action and passed the "Omnibus Crime and Safe Streets Act." The dual purposes of the act were to "Reduce Crime" and "Improve the System." The preamble to the act places the responsibility for preventing crime with the local authorities. To this end, the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) was established within the United States Justice Department. Basically, this agency was mandated to provide three types of assistance to state and local criminal justice agencies. The first type of assistance is in block grant form. Every state, based on its population and crime rate, receives a block grant from which they must fund projects within the state that contribute to the reduction of crime or the improvement of the system. Louisiana receives approximately eight million dollars per year in this block grant money. Any agency receiving a grant of these funds must allocate a certain percentage of "match," usually 10%, to insure local participation in the project. Since the purpose of the assistance is to bring about improvements, there is a three year limit on funding to insure the constant availability of funds for innovative projects and to encourage only those projects which are likely to be continued with local monies after the grant period expires.

To insure that there is planning for the expenditure of these funds and that all of the guidelines are followed, LEAA is directed to grant the second type of assistance, planning money. This money is used to establish agencies in each state to plan for the proper distribution of the assistance funds and to administer the money granted to the various agencies. According to the act, each agency is to have an advisory council, appointed by the governor of the state, to oversee its operation. This agency is known as the State Planning Agency (SPA). In Louisiana, the term "Louisiana Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Criminal Justice" applies to both the planning agency and its advisory council.

At present, there are over 60 Commission Members who are appointed by the Governor and represent various components of the criminal justice system. Membership includes the Attorney General, the Superintendent of Public Safety, the Director of the State Police, the Judicial Administrator of the Supreme Court, the Director of the Department of Corrections, the Adjutant of the Louisiana National Guard and the Former Director of the Louisiana Youth Commission. On the local level, judges, district attorneys, sheriffs, police chiefs, mayors, defense attorneys, and private citizens are all represented. It is the only official body in the state with members representing the entire spectrum of criminal and juvenile justice activities. The Commission normally meets once a month to conduct its business, which includes planning the distribution of LEAA funds to state and local criminal justice agencies and governmental units.

The State Planning Agency operates as a regular state agency and has three main functions: planning; grant administration; and, auditing. The main office is in Baton Rouge with district planning offices in nine locations throughout the state. The district officers develop plans for fund distribution and administrative grants in their respective areas. Each district office has an advisory council composed mainly of local criminal and juvenile justice officials.

The third type of assistance that LEAA is authorized to administer is in the form of "discretionary grants." These grants come directly from the national level and are used to give impetus to projects that LEAA administrators believe to be innovative and effective in controlling the problem of crime.

The Omnibus Crime and Safe Streets Act, while originating at the federal level, has nevertheless established a system that can be used for an interdisciplinary approach to the problem of crime in Louisiana. While the LEAA administrative process was developing, there were many complaints that LEAA was operating as a "supermarket for the police," mainly providing equipment, sometimes of questionable value, to law enforcement agencies. Many of these complaints were deserved. Criminal justice planning data was usually not available. Many local officials were distrustful of the obligations involved in the acceptance of federal money. The criminal justice system has become more complex and sophisticated. With the aid of federal funds, a new facet of statistical reporting was created. Under the authority of the Attorney General, the Louisiana Criminal Justice Information System became operational in 1972.

In 1971, a step toward long-range planning was taken when the Administrator of LEAA, at that time Jerris Leonard, appointed a National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals. Unlike many Commissions before, the NAC, as it was called, tried to develop a clear set of priorities, goals, and standards to direct a national strategy to reduce crime, rather than simply studying the causes of crime. Their work, comprising six volumes, was presented at a National Conference on Criminal Justice held in Washington, D.C. in January, 1973. Later in 1973, the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 was amended by Congress to include a requirement that all states include "standards, priorities, and goals" in their 1976 comprehensive law enforcement plans.

The Advisory Commission's work has caused controversy throughout the country. The Commission's recommendations included the following: the elimination of importation, manufacture, sale, and private possession of handguns by January 1, 1983; the abolition of the practice of plea bargaining; and, the phasing out of all major juvenile offender institutions. From the outset, however, the work of the Advisory Commission has been treated only as a set of recommendations. LEAA has encouraged the use of many individualized approaches for dealing with the adoption of Standards and Goals. As has been stated in many publications, it is only the process which is endorsed, not the particular result.

In Louisiana, it was decided that the Commission, with its diverse membership, would be the ideal group to prepare criminal justice standards and goals for Louisiana. Accordingly, the Commission was divided into the following five committees: Community Crime Prevention; Juvenile Delinquency; Law Enforcement; Courts; and, Adult Corrections. These committees were assigned the tasks of gathering opinions from the public, drafting Standards and Goals for Louisiana, and presenting them to the full Commission for adoption. A discretionary grant, originally for $81,000, but later increased to over $200,000, was applied for and received. The first meeting of the committees was held in May, 1974, at which time the committees evaluated the tasks that lay before them.

In many ways, the job of the Community Crime Prevention Committee was the most difficult. A few specific topics, such as drug abuse prevention and security measures, had been assigned the committee. However, they soon found themselves involved in such controversial topics as governmental ethics, child abuse, and the general discussions on the causes of crime. Since many of the topics discussed were not the responsibility of criminal or juvenile justice areas, it was decided that the committee would hold itself open to all subjects logically related to crime prevention, but would write standards only for agencies that function within the traditional criminal justice system. They would, however, make recommendations for other agencies.

The Juvenile Delinquency Committee was also faced with a difficult task. The system of juvenile justice in Louisiana is probably changing more rapidly than in most states. The 1974 Legislature enacted legislation preventing the incarceration of status offenders, which was implemented by January 1, 1976. This legislative session also provided for the establishment of the Division of Youth Services. The courts have been steadily moving to guarantee juveniles the same rights as adults in criminal proceedings, as well as more rights in their dealings with their schools.

In the law enforcement area, most of the recommended standards dealt with law enforcement procedures. The most important issues, and the ones best understood by the public, were educational standards, training for law enforcement officers, and the consolidation of law enforcement agencies.

Most of the problems in the court area, at first, seemed to be technical in nature. The issues that emerged, however, seemed to focus on the amount of discretion exercised in the court systems — the discretion of prosecutors in pressing charges and the discretion of judges in handing down sentences. The most heated discussions in the initial meetings centered around the National Advisory Commission's recommendation to abolish "plea bargaining."

The most controversial area was undoubtedly adult corrections. During the course of the development of standards and goals, the Department of Corrections came under a court order mandating drastic improvement of all phases of prison life at the main institution for men at Angola. The parish prison in New Orleans has been under an order for some time and a new prison is being constructed there. Among the topics in the corrections area to be faced were the nature of corrections, rights of offenders, and the decentralization of the main state institution for men at Angola.

In the Corrections substantive area, the term "objective" was substituted for "standard" due to the fact that the Corrections Committee believed that "standard" connotes a presently existing performance criteria and that such a delineation might induce further judicial pressure.

At the initial meeting, plans were made for each committee to hold a series of public hearings throughout the state. Seven locations were chosen and the committees agreed to hold the substantive area hearings during the same week in each location in order to facilitate publicity and staff travel.

The Standards and Goals Program was officially inaugurated at a conference held on June 28-29, 1974, in Baton Rouge. Chief Justice Joe Sanders of the Louisiana Supreme Court gave the keynote address. Experts in the various components of the system from throughout the country and LEAA officials were present to provide the commission members a wider perspective regarding the process in which they were involved.

Following the conference, the committees entered the public hearing phase of the Standards and Goals program. Each month, from August, 1974, through February, 1975, hearings were held in a different location. The Standards and Goals staff mailed out hundreds of invitations prior to each set of hearings. In addition, staff and committee members visited the locations prior to the hearings and appeared on radio and television talk shows to publicize the hearings. The local district staff encouraged people to attend the hearings.

From the beginning, it became obvious that these hearings were to have a character of their own. Most persons who attended the hearings did not arrive with prepared statements, but rather with thought-provoking questions. The committee members who attended spent a great deal of time answering questions about various phases of the justice process. Copies of various standards were distributed and these attracted considerable comment. Similarly, financial burden on the taxpayers to implement some of the recommended standards did not go unnoticed.

The hearings were held at night to make it possible for those who worked during the day to attend. This caused some problems in the larger urban areas, where, ironically, the fear of crime prevented some people from attending public hearings on the subject. Attendance at the hearings varied, with some turn outs of over 100 persons and some less than 25. Approximately 2,000 persons attended the hearings, some more than once.

The hearings were a valuable resource to the committees. Some issues, such as Crisis Centers for rape victims and child abuse, which were not among the standards recommended by the Advisory Commission, were the products of these public hearings. Committee members learned that not only was the public concerned, but also that many people supported innovative programs such as diversion, half-way houses, and decentralization of the State Prison at Angola. The concept of women law enforcement officers operating as line officers received little or no opposition. In the court area, the public questioned the practice of plea bargaining, but, in most cases, were more receptive to the practice of plea negotiation when they learned how the district attorneys on the committee utilized it. While most audiences questioned the disparity of sentences, they also agreed with the court committee that each case is different and that judges must be allowed discretion.

In February, 1975, the final hearings were held and the committees began drafting sessions. From that time until June, committees held meetings at regular intervals. Utilizing the public response at the hearings, standards recommended by the National Advisory Commission and other groups, such as the American Bar Association, and their own experience as criminal justice practitioners, the individual committees drafted standards for the Louisiana Criminal Justice System. In these meetings, the discussions were often spirited, as conflicting philosophies and views clashed.

Four of the committees' reports were received and adopted by the Commission on June 11 and 12, 1975. In addition, a systems report, prepared by the staff, with the assistance of the Louisiana Criminal Justice Information System, was presented first to the Committee of Chairmen for approval then to the full Commission for adoption. The corrections report, after further revisions, was finally adopted by the Commission on July 25, 1975.

At the same time the Commission approved and adopted criminal justice standards, it also adopted state goals and priorities. (The state goals and priorities are incorporated within the framework of the forecast of results and accomplishments section of the Comprehensive Law Enforcement Plan.)

The process by which state goals were determined relies heavily on the Problems and Needs submitted by criminal justice agencies in the State. After the problems and needs were formulated, the information provided regarding deficiencies and problems in the criminal justice system and specific crime problems was analyzed intensively for the purpose of determining statewide multi-year goals and, finally, priorities. Measurable goals for each substantive area, plus crime and delinquency, were drawn from the problems and needs on the basis of several important factors. Feasibility, with respect to existing and possible manpower and funding resources, was a highly regarded factor in the formulation of the long-range goals. Crime goals were set only after much attention was given to the characteristics of the target crimes and their concentration patterns across the state, as indicated by the statewide problems and needs. Other factors considered by the SPA in the preparation of the goals include socio-economic conditions in the state, changes in public attitude, public acceptance of the activities of the Louisiana Criminal Justice System and the task it strives to perform, and possible new methods for the measurement of progress in the attainment of goals. Finally, whether a goal is challenging enough to evoke substantial interest was also an essential factor considered. Goals thus established reflect the character of the approach to Louisiana's comprehensive planning effort for the criminal justice system and provide a ready basis for measuring progress toward their attainment.

The setting of priorities followed the formulation of the statewide goals. Priority setting in this sense may be defined as the subjective assessment of the relative importance which the achievement of specific objectives would bear in relation to the total of the desired accomplishments. The criteria for their selection may vary somewhat; however, they do necessarily retain in common the concept of identifying the degrees of importance exhibited by various proposals for attaining goals within each substantive area. In general, the same criteria for establishing goals was employed. Feasibility and acceptance of particular goals were primary considerations. Rather than consolidating all of the goals into a single list of priorities, prioritization of goals within a single substantive area was decided to be more effective in improving the Louisiana Criminal Justice System. The staff-recommended goals and priorities were presented to the full Commission for debate and amendment June 11 and 12, 1975 and were subsequently approved and adopted.

As can be seen, what follows in this book and in the companion books on each criminal justice component, is the product of the labors of many people. It will be a valuable tool in upgrading law enforcement and criminal justice in Louisiana. Perhaps more important than the product, however, is the process by which standards and goals were determined. In addition, it is not intended to be the final step. As goals are attained and standards accomplished, sights will be set even higher. It may be realized that in some cases, the Commission was over optimistic and set impossible goals. Re-evaluating and revising the goals will be a continuous process. What is offered here is the first product, and evidence that the first step in the ultimate improvement of the criminal justice system has been taken.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE PLANNING FOR THE FUTURE

Within the criminal justice planning process, goals serve both to describe where we desire to go and when we desire to arrive. As such, they function to provide a realistic yet challenging and measurable objective for concentrating and focusing programmatic efforts of the criminal justice system. Without goals, the way we should proceed cannot be rationally determined.

Governing the formation of goals is the mission of the criminal justice system and the related concepts of problems and needs. The first of these, the mission of the criminal justice system, prescribes its overriding purpose, to reduce crime and delinquency and to improve the quality of justice in America. Given such a mission, system members begin to evolve basic perceptions regarding which activities support or hinder its accomplishment. Those activities or conditions which impede the mission are rightfully interpreted as "problems" and the resultant solution or corrective action is understood to be a "need."

Planning goals, in turn, evolve from a commitment to the mission of the criminal justice system as well as the notion that the most appropriate strategy for directing the activities of the system, given its mission, would be to resolve the problems which impede its successful and timely and efficient attainment. From problems and needs, individual goals are derived indicative of the action which must be taken if a certain level of improvement within a prescribed amount of time can be realized. Goal-setting, then, is not a static process since successive levels of improvement may be discerned and set forth as original goals are attained or as new information regarding the nature and extent of the problems and needs thwarting the success of the mission become available.

Standards likewise serve a directive or management role within the criminal justice planning process. Best understood as "performance criteria" or "levels of performance" which critical analysis reveals and informed judgement believes to be essential to more efficient functioning, standards provide yet another indication of specific direction necessary for improvement. Different from goals, however, standards do not impart the need for positive action within a prescribed time period. While goals within the planning process must govern programmatic activities by definition, standards are more likely to be interpreted as "mileposts" serving to advise agencies of the criminal justice system as to their whereabouts in relation to a more desirable place or condition. Standards may, however, form the basis for goals, programs, or even individual project objectives in comprehensive planning. In addition, standards exhibit utility in helping to define and analyze the extent of problems and needs.

Insofar as priorities are concerned within the process of comprehensive planning in Fiscal Year 1976, Louisiana has established priorities among all goals which were adopted. Since goals which were adopted only encompassed the most critical and significant problem areas identified by the Commission, the initial phase of discerning areas of priority or importance was accomplished at this point in the planning process. Subsequently, priorities among the goals were identified to provide further and more specific delineation of the variation in importance which the achievement of specific goals would bear in relation to Louisiana's ability to successfully attain the mission of the criminal justice system.

Priorities are indicated by the relative order or sequence in which goals are listed by substantive area. Primary utility of the priority setting process lies in emphasis provided for the attainment of specific goals. Resource allocation and management, including staff effort, legislation, and technical assistance, as well as project funding, are primarily governed by the priorities which have been identified. Thus to view the relationship of priorities to comprehensive planning, the individual activities envisioned with relation to each goal must be interpreted with regard to the relative emphasis or importance attributed to that goal and the time established for its attainment. Priorities guide the intensity or quality of effort launched on behalf of a particular goal. As such, they remain in constant use as a tool to interpret and manage the application of all resources available. Subsequent evaluations of program accomplishments must consider priorities impacted in order to retain a balanced perspective on progress made.

STANDARD AND GOAL IMPLEMENTATION STRATEGY

In order to insure that the standards and goals process will achieve its desired end, it is necessary for positive implementation activities to begin immediately. A discretionary grant has been awarded to the Louisiana Commission on Law Enforcement to implement the standards and goals which were adopted by the Commission in June, 1975. The goal of the Standards and Goals Implementation Project is to encourage the criminal justice agencies in Louisiana to adopt the standards promulgated by the LCLE and to begin the effort to realize the goals set.

An examination of the task of implementation reveals that there are basically three different components necessary for an effective implementation program: legislation, publicity, and the upgrading of criminal justice agency procedures. These components will initiate the process of incorporating the standards into statewide criminal justice activities.

Once the implementation process has begun on a statewide basis, standards and goals will be utilized as a measurement of the progress of LEAA-funded projects in the reduction of crime and the improvement of the system in Louisiana. In addition, criminal justice agencies will gain important insight into the direction in which criminal justice advancements are progressing.
