INTRODUCTION

The Brokerage Concept

The Division of Parole Supervision endorses the concept of the Parole Officer as a "broker of community services." Brokerage has been defined as a realistic approach to parole supervision because it speaks to the parolee's immediate and practical needs. Problems facing the ex-offender--such as lack of employment, housing, food and clothing, social rejection, lack of coping skills--cannot be solved by talk. These problems require action of a practical nature designed to provide concrete and immediate relief. This is the sort of help the offender needs now, can understand and work toward. It is the kind of goal attainment which has immediate impact on the parolee's life and can provide the types of experiences which convince him that he is important, is capable of doing for himself and can live a lawful and productive life. If the Parole Officer can help the parolee resolve some of the more pressing problems facing him, we have come a long way in removing the causes of crime and recidivism. However, no one Parole Officer has all the skills necessary to deal with the multifaceted needs of people, especially in view of increasing caseloads. The alternative is for the Parole Officer to begin by identifying the individual needs of the parolee, and then identifying the community agencies best able to provide them. Putting the need together with the service agency best able to fulfill that need is what brokerage is all about.

How to Use This Directory

This directory is designed to aid institutional parole officers in pre-parole counseling, and district parole officers in pre-parole investigations, parole plan development and especially in parole supervision. The first part of the directory should be especially helpful in fulfilling special conditions of parole such as drug and alcohol counseling or psychological counseling. The second part of the directory lists halfway houses contracting with the Board of Pardons and Paroles. Residency in these houses may be by special condition or by direct referral from field officers. Placements of parolees in halfway houses from the field have often been an alternative to parole revocation. Halfway houses provide not only supervision in temporary housing but may provide job counseling, drug or alcohol treatment and psychological counseling, and should be used when client needs cannot be adequately met within the community by public agencies. Field parole officers should use the directory before transferring parolees between districts to ascertain whether that district provides services for maintaining the parole plan. The third part of the directory shows those public and private agencies that may be useful in resolving problems in parole adjustment or parole planning such as medical needs, employment, welfare programs, veteran's benefits and treatment programs.

It's Up to You

In developing job resource banks, parole officers are encouraged to make personal contacts with community employers and personnel directors. Also, the Texas Employment Commission will furnish parole officers with current labor market information and occupational information by industry. By Division policy, parolees who are unemployed are expected to register with TEC and to follow up on jobs referred by that agency in an effort to find their own employment.

In those counties where there are no known services available (as noted in the directory), or if the cost of available services is inhibiting, the parolee should be referred to the Texas Rehabilitation Commission. Upon registering with TRC, that agency will determine whether the parolee is eligible for their assistance.

Changes in the Directory

District parole officers should make a continuous survey of services available in their counties. Any additions, changes or deletions of agencies listed in this directory are to be reported by memorandum to the Community Services Office of the Board of Pardons and Paroles, 3838 Northwest Loop 410, Suite 104, San Antonio, Texas, 78229.

NOTE: The following agencies usually provide services free of charge if the client is unable to pay. Those marked with an asterisk (*) do charge for services, usually based on a sliding scale according to the client's ability to pay. Contact the agency for other information or questions.
