My research continues on the imposition of death sentences and the actual execution of female offenders throughout American history. Preliminary findings indicate that actual execution of female offenders is quite rare, with only 398 documented instances, beginning with the first one in 1632. And the incidence of execution of females has declined considerably in the twentieth century as compared to earlier centuries.

This report focuses upon the pronouncement of the death sentence for female offenders during the post-Furman era of the death penalty. While the period covered begins with the date Furman was decided (June 29, 1972), no women were sentenced to death until 1973 and after. The data currently verified for some of the years are incomplete and are still being researched. Consistent with these findings as to the rarity of actual executions of female offenders, the annual death sentencing rate for female offenders is remarkably low.

Some brief information concerning these female offenders follows. Although the data are incomplete for some entries, it is has been reliably reported that a female was sentenced to death in that state in that year. Research continues to fill in the blank spaces.
